

02 / Creative direction + moodboard

More to the picture.

Cinematic proof meets graphic interruption. The image earns attention; the idea makes it worth keeping.

Cinematic proof. Graphic interruption.

Why this direction. The cinematic work supplies credibility. Compressed type, optical lines and pop shapes make the studio voice recognisable between projects. A quiet photograph after a loud graphic frame gives the sequence room to breathe.

A graphic vocabulary with a job.

Optical lines

Use repetition inside an image to suggest depth, movement or a change of perspective. Keep the feed itself varied.

Expressive shapes

An eye directs attention. A star marks a reveal. Let these shapes introduce an idea, then leave the project information clear.

The filter. A graphic element has to introduce a question, reveal an idea or change the pace. Project information stays factual; studio and founder content have more room to play.

Saturated color

Red interrupts. Blue gives the technology work its own space. Yellow carries a short studio thought. Each composition gets a limited palette.

Real texture

Use actual locations, imperfect surfaces and working details. The image should tell us something about the place or the person.
