

03 / Three logos + recommendation

One name. Three attitudes.

Editorial, a rebuilt Signal, and Studio. Three explorations, with one recommended primary identity.

Three explorations, one recommendation.

meta.pacific

Editorial

Recommended primary

The contrast between meta. and pacific makes the name readable without adding another symbol. The dot gives a small, repeatable pause. It can sign a quotation or sit beside expressive work without competing with either.

meta pacific.

Signal

Upright campaign signature

The heavy underlined treatment is replaced by rounded upright lettering and a contained meta block. The red stop is small enough to behave as a signature. It has more campaign presence than Editorial, without an italic slant.

Studio

Compact alternative

MP works when the full name would be too small: credits, an avatar or a corner signature. The divider keeps the full name attached in larger placements. Use the full lockup until the initials are recognised.

Choose Editorial as the primary.

It is the least dependent on a particular campaign style. It leaves the footage, founder and commercial information enough room, while the weight contrast gives the name a recognisable signature.

Where Signal wins

Reel covers, title cards and studio statements. Its contained meta block survives busy footage. This is the revised option, not the old underlined wordmark.

One primary identity, not three rotating brands. The options are alternatives for this review. Once a primary is chosen, use it consistently. The quotation creator compares all three so the decision can be made against real content.

Where Studio wins

Compact production credits and small corner marks. Keep the full-name lockup on documents and first-contact communications.
