

From a good shot to a clear next step.

A complete company homepage with three identity-led treatments. The company site is an application of the brand, not the assignment navigation.

A company homepage, not another task page.

The assignment explains the decisions. The landing page lets a prospective client see the work, understand the services and start a conversation.

Use the identity selector at the top to compare Editorial, Signal and Studio. The selected direction stays in the URL.

Three identities. Three opening rhythms.

Aerial / Meta Pacific

A clear introduction, then the view.

An ink field, orange optical lines and a coastal photograph frame an open, readable message. The contrasting wordmark stays quiet. Recommended for the primary company site.

Aerial / Meta Pacific

A stronger campaign opening.

Blue and yellow, upright condensed type and an arched photographic crop give the contained wordmark a more assertive setting.

Signal ↗

FILM THE PLACE. BUILD THE EXPERIENCE.

Look beyond the frame.

Aerial / Meta Pacific

The production studio, up front.

An orange field, black cut geometry and a square photographic window put production craft first. The compact MP mark stays separate from the message.

Studio

The path from interest to a brief.

Introduce

A clear message beside real project photography on desktop, above it on phones. The logo remains separate.

Explain

Three service groups, with detail available when it is useful.

Show

Selected projects, followed by an Anjuna tour the visitor can open.

Meet

Christobal Grego and the working process, without an invented quote or portrait.

Scope

A launch package or an ongoing relationship, followed by one contact action.

Motion that starts itself. The image opens once. Drawn mouth forms and optical fields keep moving without scrolling; text and controls stay still. A pause control sits in the footer. The Anjuna sequence changes the preview from setting to phase to proposed interior as the reader scrolls; direct controls remain available. Phones show the three views inline. Reduced-motion preferences remove the animation without removing the content.
