

04 / Mini visual identity system

Recognisable. Not repetitive.

A small set of rules that gives very different subjects the same point of view.

A stable signature. A flexible stage.

Ink

#121212

Red

#f04428

Blue

#075dce

Orange

#ff7800

Yellow

#ffdc24

Near-white is a reading surface, not the brand's overall mood. Pick two dominant colors per creative. Let photography carry its own color when that is the point.

BIG IDEA.
SMALL, CLEAR DETAIL.

Anton for expressive headlines. Jost for explanations, labels and commercial information.
Upright lettering. No stretched body copy.

Rules that leave room to design.

Logo

Keep clear space equal to the height of the lowercase “m”. Use the light or dark master, not an improvised shadow. Check it at actual corner-logo size.

Photography

Keep horizons and context when they explain the place. Use monochrome for graphic campaigns, not as a blanket filter. Never make a render look like documentary proof.

Captions

One complete thought at a time. Place captions on a solid field when the frame is busy. Keep essential text away from platform controls and test the actual preview.

Composition

Choose one visual lead. Full image, cropped detail, large type or an annotated shot. Do not use every treatment in every post.

Graphic language

Photographic crops, type scale and negative space carry the voice. Use labels to identify a place, a process or a source. Avoid default symbols and sticker-like decoration.

Motion

Show context, reveal the detail, then hold the conclusion. Track labels to the correct feature. Cut on a meaningful change, not on every beat.

Do / Don't

Do

Alternate dense and quiet compositions. Keep one clear reading order. Label visualisations. Keep the signature clear and unobtrusive.

Don't

Build a fixed red/photo/red checkerboard. Repeat a poster template for every subject. Scatter six competing callouts across one phone screen.

Check

Read the frame at phone size, without sound. Check source claims. Check the crop on every platform. Check that the next step is obvious.